HOTEL ACCOMMODATIONS IN HAWAII

San Francisco Chronicle.

The hotels of Hawaii have taken no small part in earning for the Territory its title of the "Paradise of the Pacific." It is a land of scenic grandeur, novel sports and ideal climate, but these tourist attractions have received a great deal of artificial assistance from the excellent and moderate priced hoteleries of Honolulu. Primitive hotel accommodations have gone the way of thatched huts and naked natives, and in their places the visitor of today, will find modern structures, representing an aggregate investment of millions of dollars, and containing the same appointments and service that one would expect in New York, Chicago or San Francisco.

Tourists form the principal patrons of the hotels of Hawaii, and it is to their pleasures and comforts that most of the institutions cater. Many of the structures are built after a type of architecture that harmonizes with and meets the needs of the country. They are surrounded with extensive tropical gardens, erected near points of scenic interest or accessible to water sports, and constructed with a special view to ventilation. Above all, they provide luxurious entertainment.

The Alexander Young Hotel is by far the largest, most costly and most imposing hotel building in the islands. It is situated in the business district of Honolulu, and caters to commercial guests as well as to tourists. The construction of the building, which is class A and absolutely fireproof, was begun in 1900 and finished in July, 1903. The steel, stone and marble were fabricated or cut on the mainland and shipped to Honolulu, and the structure represents an investment of $2,000,000.

The central portion of the building consists of a basement and four stories, and is surmounted by a roof garden, profuse with tropical plants and commanding a view of the Pacific ocean and the surrounding country. The towers at either end of the building rise to a height of six stories, one of them containing guests' chambers and the other the main diningroom, which also commands an unobstructed view on three sides. Off the roof garden and on the fifth floor are lounging rooms, music conservatory and dance hall. The hotel contains 248 guest chambers, arranged singly and en suite, the majority of them with private baths.

The building represents the highest type of the architect's and constructor's art. The ceilings are high, the rooms commodious and the halls wide. The whole structure conveys the idea of massiveness and spaciousness. Four passenger elevators, inclosed in shafts of steel grill work, run from the basement to the sixth floor. The wide stairways are of steel and marble, while the halls and bathrooms are lavishly decorated with imported marble. The parlors and guest chambers are luxuriously furnished.

In the basement are the pool and billiard rooms, with the cafe on the ground floor. The offices, writing room and ladies' parlors are on the second floor, all of them, together with the halls and baths, being floored with mosaic marble.

The hotel is supplied with pure artesian water from its own well, having a capacity of 3,000,000 gallons per day. Hot and cold water is piped to all the rooms, while the building is lighted throughout by electricity. Every guest room has direct telephone connection with any part of the island of Oahu. To supply the three hotels, it has its own farm and vegetable gardens, herd of prime Jersey cows, lots of runs for the production of snails, poultry yards and fish ponds, and a great variety of fruit trees producing grape fruit, papaya, lemons, limes, mangoes, alligator pears, etc.

Both the diningroom and the cafe are conducted on the European plan. The service and cuisine are equal to the best hotels on the mainland, while to the usual delicacies are added those of the tropics. The cafe contains a musicians' balcony and a Hawaiian orchestra discourses native melodies. An excellent garage is run in connection with the hotel, either for the accommodation of private cars or the rental of public machines.

The Moana Hotel, which was opened in March, 1901, is situated on Waikiki beach, the most famous of Hawaii's resorts. It is surrounded by beautiful tropical gardens, and was built and is conducted more particularly for tourists and those who would enjoy the luxurious ease or the spirited sports of a vacation in the tropics.

The main building, which is surrounded by wide verandas, contains five floors and a roof garden. The kitchen and diningroom are separate, and the latter extends over the surf and furnishes a view of incoming and outgoing vessels. On the grounds are five cottages, and these, together with the main building, contain 120 guest chambers. On the beach is a bathhouse containing 200 public rooms. A band stand, where the Royal Hawaiian band plays regularly, is situated just back of the main building. A long pier extends out into the sea.

Waikiki beach is the favorite stretch for surf bathing not only for the guests of the Moana, but for the general public of Honolulu. The coral reef that lies just off shore gives rise to the breakers that have made Hawaiian surf-riding—that world-famed sport—possible. Outrigger canoes in charge of competent natives can always be had, as well as surf boards for those who become expert enough to use them.

The Moana Hotel is open and occupied the year around, and, while designed especially for tourists, it is the permanent residence of many Honolulu residents. It is here that the social life of the Hawaiian metropolis centers, and it is here that the gay functions of the city are held. The tropical gardens lend themselves to brilliant decorations and the wide verandas to dancing, while the excellent cuisine commends itself to those who would serve luncheons or dinners in the most fastidious taste.

The Royal Hawaiian Hotel is situated in the heart of Honolulu, but far enough removed from the business center to escape the dust and noise. It was built during the reign of King Kalanikau and was long subsidized by the monarchy. It has a large main building of concrete surrounded by a number of attractive frame cottages around an inner court through which drives run. The structure is surrounded by wide circular verandas and set in tropical gardens.

The building contains 145 guest chambers, all of which are richly furnished. They open on wide upper verandas that are reserved for the use of the occupants. Particular attention has been given to ventilation, and the cool, spacious chambers receive the constant winds that blow down from the mountains. The hotel is much frequented by those who enjoy tropical surroundings, but who wish to be situated close to the business center of the city.

The Young and Moana hotels are exclusively under the ownership of Alexander Young, after whom the first one is named. The Hawaiian Hotel, while controlled by Alexander Young, is owned jointly by him and the Macfarlane interests. All three are under the management of J. H. Hertscho, who has established a reputation among travelers the world over for being not only a successful manager, but a genial host.

The Pleasanton Hotel is situated at Punahou street and Wilder avenue, in one of the most beautiful tropical settings in the islands. The grounds, which cover five acres, are crossed by winding roads, over which royal palms and flowering shrubs cast their shade. The vicinity is the most select in the city, and adjacent are the campus and buildings of Oahu College and the private residences of Governor Frear and Honolulu's millionaires.

The buildings are especially designed for a tropical country, and have wide verandas and thorough ventilation with devices that render the building mosquito proof. The main buildings is the richest structure of its kind in the islands, having quarters, oak floors and burl redwood paneled. The guest chambers are unusually large and supplied with every convenience, while the private baths are luxurious in their appointments. The Annex has just been completed and is similar in its construction to the main building. It contains commodious guest chambers, connected with private baths, while on the ground floor is a large lounging room.

The grounds contain an excellent tennis court under the shade of trees and a swimming tank, 25x50 feet and eight feet deep. It is supplied with pure artesian water and commensurate with bathrooms. There is also a thoroughly equipped garage on the place.

The general dining-room is situated in the main building and commands an unobstructed view of Mount Tanala. In the same building is a private dining-room, together with kitchen and pantries. The service and cuisine are unexcelled.

The Seaside Hotel is situated on Waikiki beach, and is surrounded by large grounds. A number of cottages are maintained in connection with the main building, where guests or cottagers are served with meals at moderate prices.

Hotels will be found in most of the towns of the islands outside of Honolulu. While they are more modest in size and appointments than those in the metropolis, they will compare favorably with hostels in communities of similar size elsewhere. The Haleiwa Hotel is one of the best on the island of Oahu, and is a favorite resort for automobile parties from Honolulu. It is also within a few hours ride by the trains of the Oahu Railroad and Land Company and the trip is one of the most picturesque in the islands.

late on Maui will play an important part in the coming political campaign is evident by the fact that already the labor leaders are feeling the pulse of their friends, many of whom have joined the Hui Unions. According to present indications, it will either put up men independent or support candidates of the other political parties, regardless of their affiliations.

One of the leaders of the union had the following to say recently regarding the situation: "So far, the sentiment of the members of the Hui Unions of Maui is for good men. The hui consists of Republicans, Democrats and Home Rulers, but, irrespective of their political faith, it is the intention of the members to support good men for legislative and county tickets to be put up at the coming campaign."

"As for the Delegate to Congress, we are unanimously in favor of Prince Kuhio, whom we believe has done good work in Congress. He will most assuredly get the support of the labor unions."

Commenting on the legislative possibilities, the speaker said that it is their intention to support George Cooke of Molokai for the Senate.

The union men claim they will put up one of their number for Chairman of the Board of Supervisors and also for Sheriff.

There is no question but that the union will cut some figure at the coming election, but just how much will depend on the ability of their leaders to hold them together.
